WORKING PAPERS

Pricing Externalities in the Presence of Adaptation (Job Market Paper)

I study optimal taxation in a general equilibrium model in which households compete against final goods producers for pollutant emitting intermediate goods. For example, as the climate warms, households use more energy in the form of air conditioning. I show theoretically that an increase in market demand for such goods shifts up the marginal profit of polluting firms. Firms respond by increasing their production leading to higher pollution levels. To take these theoretical insights to reduced-form evidence, I construct a macroeconomic climate-economy model using heat-related discomfort and cooling loads as an example. In a calibrated economy, I find that the mortality social costs of carbon in 2020 are underestimated by about 7% if such feedback is not taken into consideration.
